Getting (more) Research Active through Research and Scholarship in Learning and Teaching (G17001)

Presented by Associate Professor Duncan Nulty, GIHE in conjunction with The Griffith Social and Behavioural College

Who is this workshop for?
You may already be research active, or you may be just starting out. You may be thinking about diversifying your existing research by writing and publishing papers in relation to your scholarship and practice as an academic, or looking for ways to expand on this as an existing focus. Maybe, you’re looking for an opportunity to connect with others and discuss ways to get (more) research active. If so, this workshop is for you.

How will we approach it?
This workshop provides you with a structured opportunity to talk with other people thinking this way - from experienced researchers to those just starting. We’ll discuss: how to ‘get smart’ with your research; how to select, define and refine a research topic; how to get started with writing a paper on that topic; some different narratives/structures for research papers (their shape and size); the kind of content you would put into a paper (and what you wouldn’t); the pros and cons of finding some ‘buddies’ or engaging with an existing group. We’ll also talk about ‘strategy’ - what it takes to get published and how to maximise your impact. This is an active and discussion-based workshop in which we will collectively explore ways to get (more) active with publishing, particularly in relation to your scholarship in learning and teaching (not necessarily your substantive discipline).

What you will get by participating.
You can expect to find that you are not alone in your aspirations - and therefore that you might be able to form a small writing team. You can expect to hear ideas that will be helpful in getting you started; sustain your start; and, make the process of scholarship, research, writing and publishing more achievable.
