The Griffith Social and Behavioural Research College invites Griffith researchers, including doctoral candidates, to attend the first 2015 seminar in the ‘Indigenous Knowledges and Research’ series.

PRESENTATION

The seminar will assist researchers to explore key questions about their Indigenous-focused research and to consider how, having thought through these questions, that research might be enhanced to focus more on benefitting Indigenous communities and populations.

The Seminar will examine Indigenous research methodologies that are emerging from many countries, especially Australia, New Zealand and Canada, and in particular, the developments occurring in the health, humanities and education disciplines. There will also be a discussion on the limited attention given to Indigenous methodologies in many projects and how their incorporation may enhance the quality and impact of the project outcomes.

PRESENTER

Professor Adrian Miller

Adrian is of the Jirrbal people of North Queensland. He is Professor of Indigenous Research at Griffith University leading the Indigenous Research Unit and Network. During the past 20 years in higher education, Adrian’s experience has been in management, leadership, academic program development, teaching and research. He has made significant contributions to Indigenous health and education, and has undertaken leadership roles in community-based and government committees to advocate the views of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families. Research capacity development has been a primary focus in his research activities and has led to positive outcomes for Indigenous community members and organisations. Adrian also has a strong interest in applied and translational research. The highly collaborative manner in which he has undertaken research has contributed to intellectual and methodological developments in health and education fields.
